ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

Honduran law mandates that the program source at least 40% of its food from small (family farm) producers to stimulate the economy. Private companies are involved with food trading, food processing, and transport. School feeding committees, comprised of parents prepare and serve the food to the students. Approximately 40,000 volunteer cooks are part of the program. These include many indigenous women, particularly in the Garcias a Dios department.

SUCCESSES AND CHALLENGES

A positive development is that the domestic purchase of vegetables, fruits, eggs, and dairy have been improving since 2012. This has had a positive impact for participating small family farms.

Local governments and organizations asked for a school feeding law, but it was not approved, nor implemented.

The country suffers from ongoing conflict, including shootings on the roads. This impedes food delivery. There is no stable budget for PNAE. The program is lacking skillful, committed, and sustained (with stable pay) professionals. The program is vulnerable because there are inadequate staff for monitoring program activities.

The challenges are to achieve a stable and sufficient budget, remove political influences from the program, and staff the PNAE with a skilled and multidisciplinary technical team.

STUDIES CONDUCTED

Studies have been conducted, but none were specified.
