ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

20 nutritionists were involved in school feeding programs in the 2017–18 school year. Health education is sometimes offered, though this isn’t compulsory as part of the school feeding programs.

Note: The Swiss Quality Standards for Mid-day Meals began in 2016, and so far, the program consists primarily of quality standards and workshops. There are as yet no defined objectives for implementation.

SPECIAL NOTES

Switzerland has a tripartite system. The responsibilities for school feeding often lie with the regional authorities (cants) or local authorities (communities, schools, and the private sector). The national government contributes to the development costs and supports the launch of the program. The cantons and communes finance the implementation. These reported budget numbers exclude food costs but include consulting, networking, and development. Thus, this should not be interpreted as the complete school feeding budget.

SUCCESSES AND CHALLENGES

School feeding programs in Switzerland have been successful at increasing the sensibility for healthy and sustainable eating among authorities, parents, and school staff. They cultivate creative freedom, include a focus on healthy nutrition and pedagogy/psychological aspects, and are characterized by both a bottom-up and top-down approach to program management.

Challenges associated with school feeding include savings measures, the need to maintain and improve working conditions (working hours, work guarantees), and ensuring the proper training of employees.
